As economies develop, in most cases their structure changes as agriculture declines in importance relative to industry and services. Yet agriculture usually grows absolutely, often ahead of population growth; while ideally labour productivity rises, allowing release of labour from farming to other activities. People move from rural to urban areas, cities grow, and economies become urbanised. A demographic transition takes place as well, as both death rates and birth rates decline, the latter ...

Despite the rapid process of urbanization observed in most developing and transition countries, poverty still remains a predominantly rural phenomenon (IFAD, 2001). Not only do a majority of the poor live in rural areas, but also the severity of their destitution is, on average, far greater than in urban areas. These trends are expected to persist in the foreseeable future. That being the case ...

History suggests that countries that rapidly urbanize see their rural-urban income gap rise at first, and decline only after a considerable part of the population has shifted to urban centers. This phenomenon was already observed in the 1950s, empirically by Simon Kuznets, and underpinned by Nobel Prize winner Arthur Lewis’ theory of economic development.
